Shrewsbury from underneath its graceful spires nestles close by, with its clustering red brick buildings and tiled roofs. The distant cool blue hills complete a picture sweet in its charming simplicity. The dear kindly English scenery is nowhere found to greater perfection than on this Welsh borderland. When I executed the painting from this spot, its quality as a national type suggested itself to me very strongly. The pleasant emotions which moved me had their origin in many things. The wholesome herds of cattle, the rich meadows, the town rising from this wealth of land, and beyond, the low-lying range of hills, all seemed to tell a tale of England. After spending a week or two here, I began to feel how great an influence the soothing nature of the place had upon me. Keeping strictly to my rule when teaching of only giving one three-hour lesson daily, I found ample time for my own work. Early evening is always a favourite time for me to begin painting. In my experience the only drawback to this time of day is the falling dew, which hinders the paint from drying. No better plan can be found when this is the case than to leave a line of dry paper between the colour masses. Great care must be taken to keep the colours separate, as explained in an earlier chapter. Much advantage is found when working towards the evening from...
